Shifting Global Power

Power is shifting on the international stage. It always has been. In this week we focus on the geopolitical hot-spots of the moment, examining the new holders, and even the new definitions, of global power.

- Each day, we explore one topic or definition of power, and identify the major players in that arena.
- How is power even defined, beyond money and military might? Is it natural resources, technology, education, diplomacy and aid, culture?
- As power shifts, so too do identities and values. Are there ways power ought to shift?

Exploring Race and Culture in America with Wynton Marsalis and Jazz at Lincoln Center

Featuring the third annual Chautauqua Food Festival

The intersection of race and culture creates a unique vibrancy to American democracy, often channeling and challenging the ugly effects of racism, bigotry and inequality, past and present. In this week, we examine the different ways that race and culture shape and enrich our society, and how being responsible consumers of culture, regardless of our different backgrounds and tastes, matters to who we are as citizens and as an American community. We open and close the week with renowned trumpeter Wynton Marsalis, who explores race and culture as a testing ground for the principles of American democracy.
